Congress passes bill to begin scenic byways renaissance

Under normal circumstances, a traveler might overlook Berlin or Winesburg or Walnut Creek when driving through Ohio. But since the Amish Country Byway was designated a National Scenic Byway, these towns northeast of Columbus have become tourist havens.

And for good reason. The 76-mile long Amish Country Byway is a breath of fresh air that compels you to slow down – and roll your windows down – and stop at roadside stands overflowing with produce, baked goods and homemade furniture.

Unfortunately, the National Scenic Byways Program has been largely dormant since Congress pulled support for it in 2012. But now, with passage this week of the “Reviving America’s Scenic Byways Act of 2019,” the secretary of Transportation will start the application process for new byways in the next 90 days and designate a round of new National Scenic Byways within one year.
